Learning to Learn

Common wisdom holds that to learn something and get better at it, one has to be willing to begin as a fool. Of course, learning anything new is daunting, but being a fool was the one thing I wasn't willing to be! I avoided challenging activities as I feared being judged as incompetent at anything. However, an impending life transition forced me to face my fear. It was about the last semester of college when it occurred to me that I had to say farewell to the carefree days and take some initial steps to build my career. To be part of the world of work, I had to learn new skills. However, the issue was that I didn't want to do anything which I didn't know, but I hadn't challenged any of my skills before, nor had I done anything to improve them, so I didn't know what was it I could be good at. I then realized that one little irrational fear had hindered my personal development and future prospects. As I experienced the transition, I learned that doing something worthwhile in life requires accepting personal vulnerability. This lesson made me into someone capable of achieving my goals.

Well, I had to face my fears if I really wanted to do something in life. I was somewhat okay with writing at college, so I started working on this skill. I joined a freelancer writers' group and began offering content writing services.

In the beginning, all my fears came alive, and I was aptly reminded of why I used to avoid new things. During that time, I saw my work rejected, overlooked, and harshly judged, continuously reminding me of my incompetence. Nonetheless, I was determined not to let the setbacks hinder my journey this time.

After many falls, I learned my craft and got better at it. I presented my work for the judgment of my peers and learned to accept criticism. Apart from writing good pieces, the more useful skill I learned was how to accept and own, rather than avoid, my shortcomings in order to overcome them. This lesson made me a person who is willing to make mistakes, bear responsibility, and grow.

By facing my fears and stepping into the unknown, I cultivated in myself the ability to accept new knowledge, learn, and innovate. I aim to continue this journey at the WWS university in the ABC program. The program ABC is well-known for the creativity and innovation it has produced in the field. Through my freelancing work, I understood that focusing on learning would inevitably lead to achieving one's aims. And I would like to apply this lesson to enhance my learning and growth during my time at XYZ university.
